ORDINARY MEN

Reserve Police Battalion 101 and the Final Solution in Poland

CHRISTOPHER R. BROWNING

BOOK SUMMARY

Ordinary Men, Not Monsters

Perpetrators of genocide need not be fanatics or sadists. Browning opens with the men themselves: roughly five hundred reservists of Reserve Police Battalion 101, mostly working-class and lower-middle-class fathers from Hamburg, too old for the army and drawn from jobs as dockworkers, truck drivers, clerks, and tradesmen. They were not elite SS troops, were not selected for ideological zeal, and had little police training before being sent to occupied Poland in 1942. Drawing on postwar judicial interrogations, Browning shows that nothing in their backgrounds marked them out as natural killers. This is the central provocation of the book: if men this unremarkable could shoot unarmed women, children, and the elderly at close range and later hunt Jews through the forests, then the capacity for such conduct is not confined to a special class of people but is a danger present in ordinary societies.

> "...what group of men cannot?" — Christopher Browning

> "...within the mainstream of western, Christian and Enlightenment traditions." — Christopher Browning

The Choice at Józefów and the Pull of the Group

Peer pressure and the fear of seeming weak outweighed private conscience. On July 13, 1942, the battalion entered the Polish village of Józefów with orders to round up the Jewish population, send the able-bodied men to labor camps, and shoot the women, children, and elderly on the spot. Major Wilhelm Trapp, the visibly distressed commander, made an extraordinary offer: any older man who did not feel up to the task could step out. Only about a dozen did so at first, and a few more slipped away as the killing wore on, while the great majority shot. Browning reconstructs why from the testimony. Stepping out meant separating oneself from comrades, appearing cowardly, and leaving the unpleasant work to others. The men who refused were not heroes by temperament so much as individuals able to bear the social cost of breaking ranks, and many who shot later described nausea, shame, and a desire for the ordeal to end.

> "…the peer group exerts tremendous pressures on behavior and sets moral norms." — Christopher Browning

> "…have mercy on us Germans." — Major Wilhelm Trapp

Obedience, Routine, and Moral Indifference

Deference to authority and the division of labor dissolved personal responsibility. Browning draws on Stanley Milgram's obedience experiments to explain how orders from a legitimate hierarchy can override individual scruples, while arguing that the battalion's case adds a factor Milgram only touched upon: the cohesion of a group in which each man's conduct is observed by his peers. The killing was organized into discrete tasks—cordoning a town, escorting victims, loading trains, serving in firing squads—so that each participant could regard himself as one cog in a larger machine. Careerism and deference to superiors played their part, and repetition turned an act that initially sickened many men into routine. Over time, the sense of choosing to kill faded into a sense of simply carrying out the assignment, and indifference to the victims' fate allowed the work to continue with efficiency.

> "…can become agents in a terrible destructive process." — Stanley Milgram, as cited by Browning

> "…the road to Auschwitz was built by hate, but paved with indifference." — Ian Kershaw, as cited by Browning

War Brutalization Versus Atrocity by Policy

These killings were not a frenzy of battle but a calculated assignment. Browning distinguishes between atrocities committed within the brutalizing context of war, by soldiers hardened by combat, grief over their own casualties, and frustration with an elusive enemy, and what he calls atrocity by policy. The men of Reserve Police Battalion 101 had not been through such combat; they were policemen assigned to a mission that originated in the leadership's plan to exterminate the Jews of Europe. The violence they committed was therefore not an explosion of rage but a task carried out with deliberate calculation, from the roundups of the Lublin district to the shooting operations and the deportation of tens of thousands to Treblinka. This distinction matters because it rules out the explanation that wartime stress alone turned decent men into murderers.

> "...inured to violence, numbed to the taking of human life..." — Christopher Browning

> "...not out of frenzy, bitterness, and frustration, but with calculation." — Christopher Browning

Dehumanization and Escalation

Killing grew easier as the victims were stripped of humanity and the work became familiar. Browning examines the range of attitudes toward Jews expressed in the interrogations and concludes that, even if the men had not fully embraced the regime's ideology, they had absorbed a portrait of Jews as the enemy. Ongoing propaganda, the social distance between the policemen and their victims, and the routine of the work made it easier to see those in front of them as targets rather than neighbors. The battalion's conduct escalated from Józefów to the brutal clearing of the ghetto at Międzyrzec and finally to the "Jew hunts" of late 1943, as the men became increasingly numbed and callous. Browning engages Daniel Goldhagen's later argument that "eliminationist" antisemitism among ordinary Germans was the decisive cause, and he maintains that a combination of conformity, deference, careerism, and wartime racism better accounts for the evidence.

> "...accepted the assimilation of the Jews into the image of the enemy." — Christopher Browning

> "...driven with an almost unimaginable ferocity and brutality..." — Christopher Browning